Hi Carrie, I needed to get my thoughts together on how this could all work.

If you would like to offer more than one of these classes during the afternoon, I can modify my usual "talk" to simply be putting the project together. At the Mequon Public Market, I spent a good amount of time on design, choosing plants etc. But in this case, my thought is that I would focus the time on what it takes to make the container, have them make it and then just a few minutes on how to take care of it. I would think an hour would work then.

That being said, I would think a group of 25 is doable (the 20 is more about the space limitations at the market) as long as you provide the appropriate work space for them. And you could offer two of these if you have the available time with whatever else you have planned.

The issue of pre-registration is important - it's really the only way I can cost effectively provide all the materials. The Market uses Eventbrite. Or, you could also have the registration via a QR code pointing to a website that captures the registration. The code could be included with any of your advertising. I assume since the Festival has to pay me the $20 per participant, you'd want a record of the people who signed up. (And I would ask that I be paid on who signed up, since with no cost to the participants you might end up with more no shows than usual.)

These are my thoughts. What are you thinking?

Amy

Hi Amy,

They did like the last idea of the smaller succulent for a $20 fee. Like I said. The Festivals Committee would pick up the fee. How long should we allow for this activity and what do you think is the best way to promote signing up? You're still thinking only 20 people? We'd like to have you on the stage doing this, maybe right at the beginning at noon? Let me know your thoughts!

Thanks,

Carrie
